ABSTRACT

Intended for parents of handicapped children, the booklet discusses parental rights in New Jersey regarding their child's education. Covered are the following topic areas (sample subtopics in parentheses): legal provisions (free appropriate public education, evaluation, classification, individualized education programs, placement): right to be informed (notice, laws and regulations, records); disagreement with the school district (review, hearing, appeals): and special situations (children under age 5 or over 20, children with mild speech problems or with temporary illness or injury, eligibility for day training, children placed by parents in private schools, discipline of handicapped students, and children whose parents cannot be located). Among appended information are definitions of handicapping conditions and addresses of organizations concerned with the handicapped. (CL)

Your Rights in Brief

If you think your child is handicapped, you have:

- The right to have your child fully tested by your school district, at no cost to you.
- The right to see the results of this testing and all other records about your child
- The right to have your school district consider the reports of people outside the district who have tested your child.
- The right to a written notice of the district's decision about your child's handicap and the reasons for the decision.

If your child is handicapped, you have:

- The right to a free appropriate public education for your child.
- The right to have your child educated in a setting which is as "normal" as possible.
- The right to have an Individualized Education Program (IEP) written for your child.
- The right to participate in the conference where the IEP is written.
- The right to have your child's IEP updated at least once a year.
- The right to have your child re-tested by your school district at least every three years.

If you disagree with your school district, you have:

- The right to be fully informed about the reason for the school district's decision.
- The right to have your child tested by someone outside the school district, at no cost to you.
- The right to a review of your disagreement by your district superintendent or a state Department of Education official.
- The right to a formal hearing and a decision by an independent hearing officer.
- The right to appeal the hearing officer's decision to the Commissioner of Education, the State Board of Education, and the courts.

Some Suggestions For Parents

During the past few years, the education of handicapped children has become the subject of increased attention, both in New Jersey and in the nation as a whole. Laws have been written and put into effect which guarantee certain important rights to these children and their parents. One important change has been to increase the opportunities for parents to have a voice in educational decisions about their children. In this booklet we hope to help you, as parents, to take advantage of those opportunities, by informing you about your rights and advising you about what to do to make sure they are enforced.

It is important for you to understand from the beginning what we mean by "rights." When we say, for example, that your handicapped child has a "right" to a free appropriate public education, this does not mean that your child will automatically receive such an education, without any effort on your part. What it does mean is that the law is on your side; you can go to your school district with the knowledge that you are not asking for some special favor to be provided your child because of his or her handicap, but rather for what that child is entitled to under the law.

In order for your child to receive the full benefit of the new laws, you must learn to be an effective advocate for your child. As an advocate, you are the person who speaks on behalf of the child, who understands his or her needs best and takes action to make sure that these needs are met. Remember that while teachers and other school professionals may be experts in the education of handicapped children, they have many other children to be concerned about. Only you are in a position to speak on behalf of your particular child. In order to be an effective advocate for your child, you need to be fully informed and to know how best to use your information. While this entire booklet is intended to help you do this, the following are some general suggestions which may be useful to you.

First, as soon as you find out that your child has a problem, learn as much as you can, both about that particular problem and about education of handicapped children generally. Read as much as you can on the subject. Talk with doctors, teachers, and other professionals and with other parents. Consider joining an organization of parents whose children have similar problems, such as the Association for Retarded Citizens or the Association for Children with Learning Disabilities. (See page 58 for a list of such organizations.) Keep in close contact with your child's teachers and other people in your school district who are responsible for your child's education. Ask them for an explanation when you don't understand something.

Begin keeping a notebook about your child's education. Put into it all your copies of school records, reports, and educational plans, as well as any letters or other forms which the district sends to you. Whenever you have an important request to make to the district, put it in writing, and make a copy for your notebook. When you meet or talk on the telephone with someone from the school district, make an entry in your notebook, telling whom you talked to, when, where, what you discussed, and what was decided. This record will prove to be useful to you later, as you follow your child's progress in school and help to plan his or her educational program.

Find out who can help you if you run into problems getting your child the program he or she needs. Try to pick out someone in the school district who knows you and your child, and who can help you coordinate your dealings with the district and answer your questions. Know whom to call if you can't resolve a problem at the district level. Every County Superintendent's office has a County Supervisor of Child Study, whose job it is to monitor special education programs in the county and help resolve problems with local districts. Beyond this, there are four Regional Child Study Teams with responsibilities in this area. Addresses and telephone numbers for these people can be found beginning on page 54.

Finally, remember that the idea of parents' being involved in planning their child's educational program is a new one for the school district as well as for you. It may take a while before you are comfortable in dealing with each other and respecting each other's area of expertise. The people in the school district are the education experts; but you are the expert on your child. If together you can work out a relationship that takes full advantage of both these strengths, you will have taken an important step toward making the most of the educational opportunities for your child.

Who is a Handicapped Child?

A "handicapped child" is a child who, because of some physical, emotional, intellectual or social problem, needs the help of a special educational program in order to learn to his or her fullest ability. Children defined as handicapped can be grouped into the following general categories*:

- Mentally retarded—children whose intellectual and social abilities are significantly below average.
- Neurologically or perceptually impaired—children who have difficulties in learning because of disorders of the nervous system or of the basic psychological processes involved in understanding and learning. These children are often called "learning disabled."

*On page 44 is a table containing the names and exact definitions of all the conditions which are considered educational handicaps under New Jersey law.

- Emotionally disturbed—children with severe and prolonged emotional problems.
- Socially maladjusted—children with serious social or behavioral problems.
- Chronically ill—children with an illness or other temporary or permanent health condition which prevents them from participating in a regular school program.
- Orthopedically handicapped—children with serious physical handicaps involving bones, muscles, or other body tissues, who because of these handicaps need some kind of special educational program.
- Visually handicapped—children who are blind or partially sighted.
- Auditorily handicapped—children who are deaf or hard of hearing.
- Communication handicapped—children with mild or severe speech difficulties.

It is important to realize that a child who is having difficulty in school is not necessarily handicapped, although such a child may need or be receiving certain kinds of help. For example, many schools have special programs for children whose native language is not English, and who have trouble learning in English, but children are not to be considered handicapped just because they take part in such a "bilingual" program. Similarly, many children who are not handicapped receive special help in basic subjects such as reading or mathematics, as part of a program called "remedial" or "compensatory" education. In order for a child to be considered handicapped, and therefore entitled to the rights discussed in this booklet, his or her difficulties must be caused, at least in part, by one or more of the conditions listed above. Of course, a child who needs bilingual, remedial or compensatory help may also be handicapped, and may be entitled to the benefits of both kinds of programs.

Certain of the procedures described in this booklet do not apply to two groups of children: those whose only handicap is a mild speech problem, and those who are confined to home or a hospital by a physician because of a temporary illness or injury. See page 38 for a discussion of the standards which apply to these children.

The rights discussed in this booklet apply to children of school age, that is, between the ages of five and twenty. A handicapped student who reaches age twenty after July 1 of the school year is entitled to continue in the school program for the rest of that year. Some school districts have educational programs for handicapped children younger than five or older than twenty years. If your child takes part in such a program, he or she may be entitled to some or all of the services described here. See page 37 for a description of what standards apply to these programs.

To find out whether your school district operates an under-five or over-twenty program in which your child may participate, call or write the office of your Superintendent of Schools.

What is Your Handicapped Child Entitled To?

FREE APPROPRIATE PUBLIC EDUCATION

Special Education

Under New Jersey and federal law, every handicapped child is entitled to a free program of education which is individually designed to meet his or her unique educational needs. Such a program is called "special education." While this does not mean that your child is entitled to the best or most expensive program available, the law does require your school district to provide your child with a planned educational program which takes account of his or her handicap and gives the child the special help he or she needs in order to learn. No child may be excluded from the public schools on the grounds that the child is too severely handicapped to benefit from education. The law recognizes that every child is able to learn and requires educational opportunities to be provided for all.

Related Services

In addition to the special education program itself, your child is also entitled to receive, at no cost, other services which are necessary to help him or her to benefit from the education. The law refers to these as "related services." Some examples of related services are:

- Transportation to and from the child's school, including special equipment or other assistance if necessary.
- Physical or occupational therapy.
- Counseling for the child or the parents.
- Speech correction.
- Services of an audiologist for children with hearing loss, including selection and fitting of a hearing aid (but not the cost of the hearing aid itself).
- Learning consultant services.
- Psychological or social work services.
- Vocational services, to help prepare the child for employment.

Remember that these are only examples; there may be other types of related services which a particular child needs in order to benefit from special education. A school district is not required to provide or pay for medical treatment, but if your child needs some other service to benefit from special education, then that service must be provided by the school district.

If your child is entitled to special education and related services, your school district must furnish them free of charge. You cannot be required to pay any of the costs of education or related services, except for such minor expenses as admission fees to school-sponsored activities which the parents of nonhandicapped children also have to pay.

Equal Treatment with Nonhandicapped Children

Your child has a right to have as long a school day and school year as nonhandicapped children in your district, unless a different schedule is necessary because of the child's individual needs. Classrooms and other facilities for children receiving special education must be in as good condition generally as those for the rest of the students in the district. The school district must make sure that handicapped children are not kept out of certain school programs because of physical barriers in the school building, such as stairs or narrow doorways.

School Activities

Your child is entitled to participate, if he or she is able, in nonacademic school courses such as physical education, industrial arts, fine arts, music, home economics, and vocational education which are available to nonhandicapped students. If necessary, these courses must be adapted to meet his or her particular needs. Other school activities, such as athletics, social and recreational activities, must be made available where such activities are appropriate for your child. After successfully completing his or her educational program, your child is entitled to receive a diploma and to participate in graduation activities with nonhandicapped children.

Services to Private School Children

If you choose to place your child in a private school yourself, when there is an appropriate special education program available in the public schools, your public school district does not have to provide or pay for the child's education. There are certain services, however, which the school district must make available to your child in this situation. See page 39 for a description of these services.

EVALUATION

What is an evaluation?

Before your child can be placed in a special education program, he or she must be tested and observed, at no cost to you, by professionals employed by your school district. This process of testing and observation is known as "evaluation." The purpose of this evaluation is to gather information about your child from many different points of view. This information will then be used to decide whether your child is handicapped and in need of special education; if the answer to the question is yes, the evaluation results will be the basis for designing an educational program to meet the child's particular needs.

When must an evaluation be done?

A school district must evaluate your child when someone brings to their attention the fact that the child may be handicapped. The "someone" who notifies the district may be a teacher, a counselor, or other person in the district itself, or someone from an agency which has had contact with your child, or it may be you, the parent.

If you know or suspect that your child has a handicap, but your school district has not yet performed an evaluation, you should notify your school principal in writing and request that an evaluation be performed. Make sure your letter is dated, and keep a copy for yourself; this will give you a record of when and to whom your request was made. An example of a letter requesting an evaluation can be found on page 51.

Your right to notice and consent

Once the district learns that your child needs evaluation, you must be notified in writing, in language which you can understand, of the reason that an evaluation is planned. (This is required even if you yourself requested the evaluation.) This written notice must also include a description of the kinds of tests and other procedures which will be used in the evaluation. You must be informed that you have a right to give or refuse your consent. You will probably be asked to sign and return the notice if you agree to the evaluation. (Don't forget to keep a copy for your notebook.)

If you refuse to consent, the school district may request a hearing before a state official known as a "classification officer" to decide whether an evaluation is necessary. The procedure for this is described under Hearing, p. 32. If the classification officer decides that your child should be evaluated, the district may proceed without your consent. Even if this happens, however, you will still have the same rights as other parents to participate in planning your child's educational program, and to challenge decisions of the school district with which you disagree.

Who performs the evaluation?

Every school district employs one or more "child study teams," which have the responsibility for evaluating children who may be handicapped and planning these children's educational programs. A child study team is made up of three members: a school psychologist, a learning disabilities teacher-consultant (often abbreviated as LDT-C), and a school social worker. Each member of the team is responsible for a particular kind of examination of your child; in addition, a medical examination must also be included. The following are the types of examinations which will be performed:

- A psychological examination by the school psychologist, to assess your child's intellectual, emotional and social development, as well as how well the child functions at home and with friends.
- An educational assessment by the learning disabilities teacher-consultant, including observation of the child, a review of his or her history, conferences with teachers, and analysis of the child's educational strengths and weaknesses.

- A social case study by the school social worker, including observation of and communication with your child and a study of family, school and community factors which affect the child's performance in school.

- A comprehensive medical examination by the school physician or school nurse practitioner, including a review of the child's medical history and an assessment of how any health problems or medical treatment (such as medication) may affect the child's ability to learn. (A report of such an examination by your private physician is sufficient if it is acceptable to the school physician.)

In addition, if the child study team suspects that your child might have a particular handicap, they may be required to have an examination performed by a person who is a specialist in that field. The table on page 44 shows which handicaps require the participation of specialists in the evaluation.

If you have had your child examined or tested privately by a doctor or another specialist, and you want the child study team to consider the opinions of these people, you may supply the team with copies of their reports. The team is required to consider these reports, but does not have to accept their findings. If the team does accept them, they must state this in their own evaluation reports.

What kinds of tests may be used?

All examinations which are a part of your child's evaluation must be based chiefly on tests which have been given to the child individually, rather than to a group of children together. If your child's native language is not English, the evaluation must be conducted in the child's native language if it is possible to do so. The evaluation procedures must not discriminate against members of a minority group or against children whose native language is not English. The procedures must also take into account the nature of your child's problem; for example, if the child has difficulties in speaking, a person attempting to test his or her reading skills must make sure that the test results really reflect reading ability and not simply the speech problems.

The child study team may use I.Q. tests as part of the evaluation of your child. They may not, however, classify your child as handicapped on the basis of the results of an I.Q. test alone. They must consider other test results as well as the child's behavior at home and in school in reaching their decision.

When must the evaluation be completed?

Within 7 days from the date the school district receives your consent to have your child evaluated, they must notify the child study team that the child is to be evaluated. This notification is known as "referral." From the date of the referral the team has 60 days to complete its evaluation and reach a decision as to whether your child is handicapped and in need of special education.

What if you disagree with the results?

You have a right to see and be given copies of all evaluation reports prepared by members of the child study team and by any other specialists who tested your child. You should make a point of requesting copies of these if they are not given to you automatically. You also have a right to an interpretation of anything in the reports which you do not understand.

If, after reading these reports, you disagree with the child study team's conclusions, you may request the school district to provide an independent evaluation—that is, one conducted by professionals who are not employed by the school district. In response to such a request, the district must do one of two things. They may agree to arrange for an independent evaluation at no cost to you. If, however, they feel that another evaluation is not necessary, they may request a hearing (see p. 32) to prove this. If after a hearing the classification officer decides that the school district's evaluation is appropriate, you may still have an independent evaluation performed, and the child study team must consider the results in classifying and placing your child, but the school district will not pay for the evaluation. It is important to note, however, that the district cannot simply refuse to provide an independent evaluation and leave the next step up to you. You have a right to this second evaluation, and the district is required either to provide it at no cost or to prove it is not necessary.

How often must a new evaluation be done?

Once your child is classified as handicapped by the child study team, this entire evaluation process must be repeated at least once every three years. If before the three years are up you believe that the conclusions of the child study team are no longer valid, and that a new evaluation is necessary, you may request the school district to perform one. The district must agree to do so if there is evidence that the child's classification is no longer appropriate, or that for some other reason the child should be re-tested.

CLASSIFICATION

Once the evaluation process is complete, the members of the child study team, together with other professionals who have examined your child, will meet and decide whether your child is handicapped and in need of special education; if so, they will then decide which one or more of the names on page 10 best describe your child's condition. This procedure is known as "classification."

If this is not the first evaluation and classification of your child, but is instead the required three-year re-evaluation, the team must review its previous decision, based on the new evaluation results, and revise the classification if necessary.

Whether or not the child study team, on the basis of its evaluation, decides to classify your child as handicapped, the team must notify you in writing of the decision. The document must contain the information listed under Notice, page 27. If you haven't already received copies of all evaluation reports which the team considered in making their decision, you should request those copies at this time.

INDIVIDUALIZED EDUCATION PROGRAM (IEP)

For every child who has been classified as handicapped, the school district is required to develop an Individualized Education Program (IEP). The IEP is a written plan which describes in detail the educational program for your child for the school year.

The first part of the IEP, called the "basic plan," is written at a conference which includes the members of the child study team, your child's teacher or teachers, and you, the child's parent. You may take someone with you to help you at this conference, such as a friend, a relative or someone else who knows your child well. Your child may also attend if you and the child study team feel this is appropriate. The purpose of this conference is to discuss all the information available about your child's educational needs and to design a plan to meet those needs. The "basic plan" part of the IEP must answer each of the following questions:

- How is this child performing in school now, in all areas? What can and what can't he or she do?
- Why did the child study team decide that this child needs special education?

- What general goals should the child achieve by the end of this school year?
- What are some of the specific objectives which the child must meet in order to achieve these goals?
- What kind of educational program will the school district provide to help the child achieve these goals? Why is this kind of program appropriate? Why is it the least restrictive alternative? How much will the child participate in school programs with nonhandicapped and less severely handicapped children?
- What kinds of related services does the child need? When will these services begin, and for how long will they go on?
- How will the child study team measure whether or not the child is achieving the objectives set for him or her?
- What role will each member of the child study team have in carrying out the IEP?

After this conference, the child study team and your child's teachers will develop the second part of the IEP, called the "instructional guide," which will set forth in detail just how your child will be taught during the year.

The team must give you copies of both the "basic plan" and the "instructional guide" when they are completed.

The IEP for your child must be reviewed at least once a year, in a conference which includes at least one or more child study team members, your child's teacher or teachers, you, and your child if this is appropriate. At this conference the IEP will be updated or rewritten, if necessary, to reflect changes in your child's performance over the past year, new goals for the next year, or any other necessary changes.

It is important to remember that your child's IEP is a statement of what is necessary to provide an appropriate education for your child. Therefore, any services listed in the IEP must be provided to your child, and you cannot be required to pay for any of the costs of these services.

The child study team must notify you and invite you to participate in the IEP conference. They must make an effort to schedule the conference at a time and place which is convenient for you; if you require an interpreter in order to participate, the district must also arrange for one. It is up to you, of course, to inform them that you need to have a different date scheduled or that you need the services of an interpreter. If neither parent is able to attend the conference, you must still be allowed to participate if at all possible, for example by telephone. If the team holds the conference without you, they must be able to prove that they made real efforts to persuade you to attend, by showing records of telephone calls, letters and visits to you. If you should discover that the IEP conference has been held without an opportunity for you to participate, you should notify your school district that you are requesting a new conference which you will be allowed to attend. If this request is refused, and you feel a new conference is necessary, you may request a review or a hearing (see p. 30).

If you are unable to participate in the IEP conference at all, the child study team and a teacher will meet and draw up the IEP without you. You will be given a copy and will be asked to sign it if you agree with it. You will still have the same right to refuse to agree to the IEP, and if necessary to request a review or a hearing (see p. 30).

The IEP conference is probably the single most important part of your role as an advocate for your child. Even if you have never before gotten involved in your child's education, you should attend this conference if at all possible; this is your chance to have a real voice in the kind of education your child will receive. If you feel uncomfortable about going alone, take someone along to help you; but by all means, go.

Preparing for the IEP Conference

Before the conference, you should try to prepare by gathering all the information you will need and then organizing your ideas, so that you can be as effective as possible in helping to plan your child's program. The following is a checklist of questions you should ask yourself as you prepare:

- Have I read all the records which the school district has concerning my child?
- Has my child been tested by all the different professionals who are required to perform evaluations according to the child's classification?
- Do I have copies of any school records which I may need, especially all evaluation reports and previous IEP's?
- Have I made notes of anything in the evaluation reports which I don't understand or with which I disagree?
- Have I sent copies of any reports of examinations or testing which have been done privately to the child study team in time for them to study the reports before the conference?

- Have I reviewed last year's IEP (if any) to see where it might be out of date or incomplete?
- Have I made a list of all the subjects which I think should be discussed at the IEP conference, such as:

  What kinds of things my child is ready to learn.
  What my child is interested in.
  What problems, if any, I am aware of with my child's current program.
  Any related services (see page 13) which my child needs but is not receiving.
  What my child's needs are in the way of preparation for future employment, such as vocational school or a pre-vocational work skills program?
- Have I shared my ideas and thoughts with friends, relatives, or others who know my child, and asked for their suggestions?
- If there is someone whom I would like to take to the IEP conference with me, have I made the necessary arrangements with that person?

While you are taking these steps to prepare for the IEP conference you should make a real effort to concentrate on your child's future education and not on any problems you have had in the past. You won't accomplish anything by bringing these problems up at the conference, so there is no point in wasting your time thinking about them now. Even if you and the school district have had serious conflicts or differences of opinion, try to put them behind you and focus all your attention on what you feel your child needs for the next year.

Participating in the IEP Conference

You should take with you to the conference your copies of your child's records, any notes or lists you have made, and anything else you may have which will support your opinions about your child's educational needs.

The purpose of this conference is to use all the information available about your child to develop the IEP, which will determine what educational services your child will receive in the next year. There are several ways in which you can help in this process:

- Make sure that each required element of the IEP is discussed and a specific decision is reached. The law requires objectives to be specific and measurable. For example, an objective such as "learn to read" is too vague, because there will be no way to tell at the end of the year whether the objective has been achieved. If, instead, the objective is stated as "increase sight vocabulary from 46 words to 250 words," the reading teacher will be able to measure the child's improvement during the year.

- The conference should be conducted, and the IEP written, in language that you understand; if terms are used which are not familiar to you, don't be afraid to ask that they be explained.
- Participate in the discussion by contributing what you know about your child's skills, interests, needs, strengths and weaknesses, and learning style. If your child's behavior at home is different from what the teachers or other school personnel describe, tell them about what you have observed. By bringing out real-life information, you can help the professionals to remember that they are talking about a real child, and not a series of test scores.
- Refer to your checklist to see that all the issues you felt were important have been covered. If you feel something has been brushed over too quickly, go back to it and ask for further discussion.
- If someone makes a suggestion about your child's program which you think is a good one, or agrees to one of your suggestions, insist that it be written into the IEP. Otherwise, the item may well be forgotten when the new IEP is being carried out.

Before the IEP can go into effect, you must approve it. Generally, you will be asked to sign it to indicate that you have participated and that you approve. Don't give your approval at the IEP conference itself; get a copy, take it home with you, and look it over carefully. If you decide that the IEP is satisfactory to you, sign and return it. If you are doubtful about some aspects of it, ask to talk to the team again, and try to work out your differences. If the problem can't be resolved, you have a right to refuse to approve the IEP and to ask for a review or a hearing (see p. 30). You should try to make your decision on whether to give your approval within a few days of the conference, if possible; but don't be pressured into signing if you really do need more time.

Implementation of the IEP

If you agree to the IEP, it must be put into effect as soon as possible following the conference date. The entire process from classification to implementation of the IEP should take no more than 30 days (not including school vacations).

By listing programs and related services in the IEP, the school system is agreeing to provide these programs and services to your child. This does not mean, however, that it is promising that your child will achieve the goals and objectives set out in the IEP. Teachers and other school personnel must make good faith efforts to help your child achieve them, but cannot be held responsible if they are not reached.

PLACEMENT

The child study team has the responsibility for recommending, based on the law, the results of the evaluation, and the IEP, what school and what type of class your child should attend. There are many different types of placements which the team may consider in making its decision:

- Placement full-time in a regular class with nonhandicapped children, with adjustments to meet your child's particular needs.
- Placement in a regular class for most of the time, but with extra instruction from a special teacher, or with part of the time spent in a resource room with a small group of students.
- Placement for most or all of the day in a special class where all the children have the same type of handicap as your child.
- Placement in a special public school for handicapped children, either in your own district or in another nearby district.
- Placement in a private school for handicapped children, either day or residential.
- Individual instruction by a tutor at home.

In deciding which of these alternatives is appropriate for your child's needs, there are several things which the child study team must consider. As a general rule, they must try to provide a program for your child which is as "normal" as possible. This is called the "least restrictive environment" rule. It means that, for one thing, the school where the child is placed should be the one he or she would attend if not handicapped, unless for some reason this school cannot meet the child's needs. In that case, the team must still try to place the child in a school as close to home as possible. The rule also means that, wherever your child is placed, he or she should be allowed and encouraged to attend classes and join in other school activities with children who are not handicapped or who are less severely handicapped, unless this would be harmful to the child. For example, your child might be taught reading and mathematics in a special class for handicapped children, but go to classes in art, music, and physical education with children who are not handicapped.

It should be noted also that the child study team must base its placement decision on your child's individual needs as identified in the evaluation reports and the IEP, and not merely on what programs are available in your district. For example, if your child needs a placement in a special class for perceptually impaired children, the team may not recommend placement in a regular class with supplemental instruction, or in a class for the mentally retarded, simply because the district currently has no special classes for perceptually impaired children; in that case the district would either have to create a perceptually impaired class or find one outside the district for your child. On the other hand, though, the school district is not required to provide the best or most expensive program which can help your child. If the placement can provide all the programs and related services listed in your child's IEP, and is in the least restrictive environment which meets his or her needs, then it probably satisfies the requirements of the law.

The school district may place your child in a private school, but only if there is no public school program, either in your local district or nearby, which is appropriate for his or her special needs. The New Jersey Department of Education maintains a list of private schools which it has approved for the education of handicapped children; a child can only be placed in a private school if it is on this list. In addition, the Department of Education must individually approve each application by a local school district to place a particular handicapped child in a private school.

It is important to remember that if the school district and the Department of Education approve a private school placement for your child, you cannot be required to pay for any program of instruction or related service which is necessary for your child's education. This is true even if the school where your child is placed is a residential school. If the child study team has decided that only a residential school can meet your child's educational needs, and this decision has been approved by the Department of Education, the room and board as well as tuition must be provided at no cost to you.

When the child study team has made its recommendation about the placement of your child, you are to be notified in writing of their decision and the reasons for it. (See Notice, p. 27.) If the team is recommending special education for the first time, or a change in placement, you should visit the school or class which has been recommended, talk to the teachers and other personnel, and ask any questions you may have about the program. You might want to take someone with you, such as a teacher or a friend, who can help you in observing the program and deciding whether it meets your child's needs. If you feel that the recommended placement is not appropriate for your child, and the child study team refuses to change its recommendation, you may request a review or a hearing (see p. 30) to challenge this decision.

Your Right to be Informed

NOTICE

Whenever the district proposes (or refuses) to refer your child to the child study team, or to evaluate, classify, or place your child in a special program, they must notify you in writing of their decision. The notice must be in a form which you can understand, and must include certain elements:

- A description of the action they propose to take or refuse to take.
- An explanation for their decision.
- A description of the possible other actions they considered, and reasons why they decided not to take them.
- A description of all reports, test results, or other procedures which they used in making their decision.
- A description of any other factors which went into the decision.

The notice must also describe fully the steps you may take if you disagree with the school district's decision. If the school district makes a change in your child's program without notifying you in advance, you have a right to demand an explanation of the decision, covering all the elements listed above. In any case, if you disagree with the decision of the school district, and you cannot work it out informally by talking with the principal, teachers, child study team members, or other personnel, you may use the review and hearing procedures (see p. 30) to resolve your conflict.

LAWS AND REGULATIONS

Once your child is classified as handicapped, your school district is required each year to give you copies of the New Jersey laws and regulations concerning special education and pupil records, if you request them. Even if you are having no problems with the district about your child's education, it is a good idea to request these materials and look them over; the more information you have about your child's educational rights, the more effective you can be as an advocate for your child.

A Spanish version of the New Jersey regulations will be given to you if you request it.

YOUR CHILD'S RECORDS

You have a right to see all records kept by your school district concerning your child, except notes made by a teacher or other school district employee for his or her own personal use only. You may read the records, take notes on what they contain, and have copies made for yourself. The school district must let you see the records within 25 days from the date you request to see them. If you have an IEP conference scheduled, or if you have requested a hearing because of a disagreement with the district concerning your child, the district must let you see and copy the records before the conference or hearing. The district may ask you to pay for the cost of copying the records, but if you are not able to pay this cost, the district must give you the copies without charge.

Someone from the school district must be present when you look at the records to help interpret them for you. If you are deaf or do not speak English, they must try to translate for you or help you find an interpreter.

The only kind of information which the school district can keep on your child is that which is related to your child's education. If a teacher or another school employee enters comments about your child in the file, those comments must be based on the person's own knowledge or observation, rather than on hearsay or suspicion, and must be signed and dated by the person who made them. If you find information in your child's records which you think does not meet these requirements or is not accurate or not complete, you may ask the school principal to correct or destroy those records. If the principal refuses, you should write to the school superintendent, explaining the details of your disagreement. The superintendent must then meet with you within 10 days and make a decision in writing about whether the records will be changed. If you are not satisfied with the decision, you may request a review or a hearing as described on page 30. In any case, you have the right to have kept in your child's file a statement written by you explaining why you feel a record is inaccurate or misleading.

With a few exceptions, no one who is not providing educational services to your child may see the child's records without your written permission. The only exceptions are for staff members of accrediting organizations, the state Department of Education, state protective services agencies, researchers who will keep the records anonymous and confidential, or persons with a court order if you are given three days' advance notice. In any of these cases, a record must be kept in the child's file containing the name and title of the person who was shown the records, the time and place, the reason, and the purpose for which the information will be used.

Once your child graduates or otherwise leaves the school district, the district is required by law to keep certain basic information as a permanent record; all other information in your child's records, including all child study team evaluations and IEP's, must be destroyed if you request the district to do so.

If your child has been placed in a private school by your district, you have the same rights concerning the child's records as you would if the child attended public school. All requests to see, change or destroy records should be made to your local district.

What if You Disagree with Your School District?

If you disagree with your school district about your child's evaluation, classification, IEP, or placement, and you cannot work out the problem informally by talking to the teachers, child study team members, principal, superintendent, or other people in the school district, there are a number of steps you may take to get the problem resolved by a third party. While these steps are taking place, the school district may not make any change in your child's program except in an emergency, unless you agree. For example, suppose your child had just been evaluated and classified as handicapped, and the child study team recommended placing him or her in a special class for the entire school day. You might agree that the child needed a special class, but feel strongly that part of the day should be spent with nonhandicapped children in courses such as art and physical education. If you began taking formal steps to challenge the team's recommendation, your child would have to remain in a regular class until the disagreement was resolved. In this case, it would probably be a good idea to agree to the special placement for the time your challenge is taking place, so that the child will be getting special help, as long as you make it clear, in writing, that you still disagree with part of the recommendation.

Once you decide to take action to oppose the school district's proposals, you must consider how you want to begin this process. You may decide first to contact someone informally for advice or assistance; some suggestions for people to call are given on page 8. If your problem is still unresolved, you may request either a review or a hearing. A review is a conference where someone will listen to both sides and recommend possible solutions. A hearing is a more formal process, and the person conducting it will make a final decision which both sides must accept (unless it is appealed, see p. 36). If you choose to go first to a review, and no agreement is reached, you may then ask for a hearing. But if you feel that it would be useless to try to settle your differences, or that the situation is too urgent to allow for a review, you probably should skip the review step and immediately request a hearing.

Another alternative would be to request both a review and a hearing at the same time. This way, if your dispute is settled at the review, you can simply cancel the hearing; if not, you have not lost any time, and because the review will at least help both sides to define the issues and make sure they have collected all the information they need, you may find that the hearing will go more quickly and smoothly.

The school district also has the right to ask for a review or a hearing to resolve a disagreement with you. If the district wants to evaluate your child, or to place him or her in a special education program for the first time, they cannot do so until you have given your consent in writing. If you refuse to consent, however, they may ask for a review or a hearing to override your decision. Also, if you request an independent evaluation (see p. 18) and the district refuses, they must request a hearing to prove that a new evaluation is not necessary. In any other situation where you and the school district disagree, the district has the same right as you do to request a review or a hearing.

REVIEW

You can request a review by a Regional Child Study Team by writing to the Director of the Office of Regional Teams (see page 54 for address). Your letter should identify your child by name, age, and school attended, and should briefly describe what your dispute is about. Don't try to make your arguments in your letter; save them for the meeting itself. Send a copy of the letter to your local superintendent, and save one copy for yourself. A sample letter requesting a review is shown on page 52. Once your letter is received, the Regional Office will contact you to arrange a conference.

Before the conference, the Regional Team or one of its members may contact your school district and arrange to review your child's records, observe your child in school and talk to teachers or other school district people who may have information which will help the Regional Team understand the issues involved. During this time you should also be preparing for the conference by trying to define exactly what your objection is to the school district's recommendations or actions, and by reviewing all records on your child to select those which you will take with you to the meeting. If your family doctor or some other professional has examined your child and made recommendations, ask for a written report and take the report to the meeting.

You may, of course, take anyone you wish to help you at the conference.

At the conference itself, the Regional Team or one of its members will probably meet with you and with the school district representatives separately, and then all together. Once the issues have been discussed, the person who is conducting the conference may suggest compromise approaches to resolving the disagreement. You should sincerely try to settle your differences with the school district, but you should not be afraid to disagree if you still feel the district is wrong.

After this conference, the person conducting the review will prepare a written recommendation for a solution, and will send copies to you and to the school district. Your copy should be mailed to you within 30 days from the date your letter requesting a review was received. This recommendation is not binding on either of you, but it may serve as a basis for your coming to an agreement with the district. Also, if it is necessary to go to a formal hearing, you or the school district may introduce the Regional Team's report as evidence to be considered by the classification officer who conducts the hearing.

HEARING

The hearing, often called a "due process hearing," is a more formal procedure than the review. It is conducted by a "classification officer," an employee of the State Department of Education, who, after hearing both sides, writes a formal opinion giving his or her decision and the reasons for it. To request a hearing, you must write to the Chief Classification Officer in the Department of Education (see page 54 for address). The same points mentioned in the discussion about a letter requesting a review (see page 31) apply to the letter requesting a hearing. A sample letter requesting a hearing is shown on page 53. The classification officer will respond with a letter giving you the date, time and place for the hearing. The letter will tell you what to do if the scheduled time or place is inconvenient.

It is very helpful, but not essential, to have a lawyer to represent you at the hearing. If you are eligible for free legal services, you may wish to contact the Legal Services organization in your area. (See page 61 for a list of Legal Services Offices). There are other organizations which may be able to provide you with expert assistance, and possibly a non-lawyer who can represent you at the hearing. (See page 58 for the names and addresses of some of these organizations.) If you can't get someone to represent you, don't panic—at many hearings the parents present their own side of the case themselves. Remember, though, that in all probability the school district will be represented by the school board's attorney.

Your Rights at the Hearing

In order to make sure that the hearing allows you to present your side of the disagreement effectively, the law guarantees you certain rights:

- The right to an impartial classification officer to conduct the hearing and make the decision.
- The right to have the hearing scheduled at a time and place which is reasonably convenient for you.
- The right to have a verbatim record kept of the hearing.
- The right to see and make copies of all records which the school district will present at the hearing at least five days before the hearing itself.
- The right to be represented by any person of your choice, including a lawyer.
- The right to present documents, to call witnesses, and to question or cross-examine witnesses presented by the school district.
- The right to prevent the school district from presenting any evidence which has not been shown to you at least five days before the hearing.

- The right to require any school official or employee who has knowledge of the case to attend the hearing.
- The right to receive the classification officer's decision and the reasons supporting it within 45 days of the date your request for a hearing was received.
- The right to have the decision of the classification officer carried out immediately, even if the school district loses and plans to appeal the decision, unless the school district can persuade the classification officer that this may be harmful to the child or other children.

The school district also has these same rights.

Preparing for the Hearing without a Lawyer

If you are going to handle the hearing yourself, there are some important steps you should take to prepare for it:

Define the issue. Try to put in writing for yourself, as clearly and exactly as possible, just what it is that you and the school district disagree about. You should try to put aside any disputes you've had with the district in the past, unless they have some very direct connection with your present problem. Be as specific as you can; it's very difficult to prove a point at the hearing if you're not sure just what you're trying to prove.

Get your child's records. Don't assume that you have copies of all the records in your child's school file. Go to the school and ask to see the entire file. If you are told that you must wait more than a few days, tell them that you have requested a hearing; ordinarily a school can wait up to 25 days to show you records, but they must let you have them before a hearing.

Identify important documents. Go through the school records, especially the most recent ones, and any other reports or documents you have relating to the problem. Pick out those which most strongly support your position. Make a list of these for yourself, identifying them by title and date, and including a brief note about why each will be helpful to you. Try to keep the number of documents to be used at the hearing fairly small; having too many can be confusing instead of persuasive. When you have decided which documents you want to use, make three copies of each of them to take with you: one for the classification officer, one for the board's attorney, and one for yourself.

Also look for anything in your child's records which supports the district's side of the dispute. Think about how you will respond if these records are brought out at the hearing.

Identify your witnesses. Decide who, in addition to yourself, should testify for you at the hearing. If you have had evaluations done privately and you wish to use reports of these evaluations to support your case, you should have the specialists who prepared the reports testify in person at the hearing, to explain their results and recommendations. It may also be helpful to have as witnesses people who have worked with your child, such as teachers or counselors, and people who are familiar with the program you want for your child. If your dispute concerns differing views of your child's abilities, a friend or relative who knows the child well may be able to give helpful information. Contact each possible witness to make sure he or she will be available for the hearing. As with documents, it is wise to keep the number of witnesses reasonably small—make sure you have a good reason for offering each one's testimony.

Prepare your questions. For each witness, decide exactly what information you want to present, and prepare a list of questions which will bring out that information. The classification officer may question the witnesses at the hearing, after you and the board's attorney have finished, but he or she has no way of knowing what the witness has to offer toward your case unless you bring it out first. Your questions to the witnesses should be only about what they have personally done, seen, and heard.

What Happens at a Hearing?

At the hearing itself, the central question which the classification officer must decide is whether the school district's recommendation, yours, or some other solution is appropriate for your child's special educational needs. The classification officer must base this decision only on evidence presented at the hearing, and must make an independent judgment without giving extra weight to the school district's recommendations.

The hearing will be closed to the public, unless you wish to have it open for some reason. Therefore the only people present will probably be the classification officer, the parties and their representatives if any, and the witnesses. If you are handling the hearing yourself, you may take someone with you for assistance or even just for moral support. A record of the hearing will be kept, either by tape recorder or by a court reporter.

At the beginning of the hearing, each side will be asked to state briefly what its position is in the dispute, and what witnesses it intends to call. Then each party calls its witnesses and questions them; generally the side which requested the hearing presents its witnesses first. After each witness testifies, the other side and the classification officer may ask the witness questions to clarify or dispute his or her testimony. After all witnesses have testified and all documents have been presented, both sides may make closing statements to summarize why they feel the evidence has supported their respective positions. If you are not represented at the hearing and you are uncertain how to proceed at any time, ask the classification officer for guidance; it is his or her job to see that both sides get a fair hearing.

The classification officer, after hearing all the evidence, may decide that an independent evaluation of your child is necessary in order to reach a decision. If such an evaluation is ordered, it must be conducted at no cost to you.

Outcome of the Hearing

The decision of the classification officer, in writing and with reasons supporting the decision, must be mailed to you within 45 days of the date you requested the hearing. This decision is to be carried out immediately, even if one side decides to appeal, unless the classification officer can be persuaded that to do so may cause harm to your child or to other children.

APPEALS

Either side may appeal the classification officer's decision to the Commissioner of Education, who can overturn the decision. Beyond this, state law provides for appeals to the State Board of Education and then to a state court. A second way to appeal the initial decision is to go to the Federal District Court in New Jersey. In either case, the process will be difficult and time-consuming; it is recommended that you obtain the services of a lawyer in such a situation if at all possible.

Some Special Situations

Up to this point, the discussion in this booklet has covered the educational rights of handicapped children as they apply in the majority of situations. In some circumstances, however, the rules must be applied differently or interpreted further in order to meet the needs of particular children. The following pages cover some of those situations.

CHILDREN UNDER AGE FIVE OR OVER AGE TWENTY

Local school districts in New Jersey are not required to provide educational programs for handicapped children under the age of 5 or over the age of 20. Many districts do operate such programs, however, either for all children, for all handicapped children, or just for those with a particular kind of handicap. To find out whether your district has such a program, call the office of your Superintendent of Schools.

If your non-school-age child participates in an educational program run by your local school district, he or she is entitled to a free appropriate public education, including all the same rights as are guaranteed to school-age handicapped children.

The New Jersey Legislature from time to time has considered a change in the law which would require school districts to provide education for all handicapped children ages 3 through 5. If this should become law, all the provisions of this booklet would apply to children between the ages of 3 and 20.

CHILDREN WITH MILD SPEECH PROBLEMS OR WITH TEMPORARY ILLNESS OR INJURY

A child experiencing only mild speech difficulties may be tested and classified as "communication handicapped—eligible for speech correction services" by a certified speech correctionist, without referral to and evaluation by the child study team. The IEP for such a child is developed at a conference which includes at least the speech correctionist, the parent, and the child's teacher or teachers. The child study team members may attend this conference, but their participation is not required. All the other provisions described in this booklet, including the review and hearing procedures, would apply, however, to this child.

In the case of a child confined to his home or a hospital by a physician for more than two weeks, the school physician may classify the child as "chronically ill—eligible for home instruction." An IEP would be developed by the physician or school nurse, the child's parent and the teacher. This child would be entitled to individual instruction at no cost for at least five hours per week, on at least three separate days, although all but two of these hours may be given by telephone or television in communication with a classroom. With these exceptions, this child is guaranteed the same services and rights as other handicapped children.

ELIGIBLE FOR DAY TRAINING

A child who has been classified as mentally retarded—eligible for day training does not have to be educated by his or her local school district. The district will instead make arrangements for placement with the New Jersey Department of Human Services, Division of Mental Retardation. This state agency operates a number of Day Training Centers which provide day programs for severely and profoundly retarded children. The local school district child study team is responsible for the evaluation and classification of an Eligible for Day Training child; the development of the IEP is the responsibility of the local team acting together with a curriculum specialist from the Day Training Center which the child will attend. Children attending these programs are guaranteed the same educational rights as are other handicapped children, and their parents are similarly entitled to all the rights discussed in this booklet, including access to student records, participation in the IEP conference, and challenges to educational decisions by using review and hearing procedures.

Parents of children classified as Eligible for Day Training should be aware that as of February 1979, there are still several unresolved questions in the laws and regulations governing Day Training Centers. While it is clear that these children must be given the same rights as all other handicapped children, it is not clear exactly which agencies—the state Department of Education, local school districts, or the Division of Mental Retardation—are responsible for what aspects of these children's programs, or what procedures apply in the case of a disagreement between a parent and the Day Training Center. Until these questions are answered, however, parents should assume that the same standards and procedures apply to Day Training Centers as to educational programs provided by local school districts.

CHILDREN PLACED BY PARENTS IN PRIVATE SCHOOL

If you, independent of your school district, have enrolled your child in a private school, the district does not have to provide all the services to which public school handicapped children are entitled, or to pay for their provision by the private school. There are, however, certain services which New Jersey law requires the district to furnish to private school students:

- Transportation to and from school on the same basis as public school students, up to a maximum cost per child of $250 a year. If the cost to the district would be more than this, you are entitled to be reimbursed $250 a year by the district for the cost of transportation.
- Identification of potentially handicapped children.
- Evaluation and classification of such children, on the same basis as public school students.
- For children classified as communication handicapped, the services of a speech correctionist.
- Supplementary instruction (instruction given in addition to the regular classroom program), for those handicapped children who would be entitled to such instruction if enrolled in the public schools.

- Transportation to and from the location where the speech correction or supplementary instruction is offered.

The child's parent must agree in writing before any of these services may be provided to the child.

To request any of these services for your child, call the office of your Superintendent of Schools.

MOVING TO A NEW SCHOOL DISTRICT

If your child was identified as possibly handicapped by your old school district, but was not yet classified, your new district should place the child in the regular school program while its child study team does its own evaluation and classification. If a teacher, principal or child study team in the new district feels that this would harm the child, they may ask the school superintendent for permission to keep him or her out of school for up to 30 days while the team completes its evaluation. During this time, however, your child must be given at least home instruction.

If your child had already been classified, and an IEP written, by your old district, the child study team of the new district still must do its own classification, IEP and placement within 30 days; during this time, however, they should place the child in a program which is consistent with the previous IEP.

DISCIPLINE OF HANDICAPPED CHILDREN

A school district may punish children classified as handicapped for violating school rules, but there are certain kinds of actions which they may not take. They may not suspend or expel a handicapped child for behavior which is caused by a handicap. For example, a child classified as emotionally disturbed should not be suspended for fighting with another student, since this would be just the kind of behavior that the special education program is supposed to deal with. The school could, of course, take whatever emergency action was necessary to protect the child or other students from harm.

If the district wants to expel, suspend for more than a short time, or transfer a handicapped student to another school or class, it must treat such action as a recommendation for a change in special education placement. This means that the child study team must decide whether such a change is appropriate for the child's educational needs. The parent must be notified of the proposed change and the reasons for it.

and must be given the opportunity to challenge it at a review or hearing.

No child, whether classified as handicapped or not, may be expelled from school without first being referred to the child study team, who must decide whether the child should be evaluated. If the team does an evaluation, it may make a recommendation to the school board that the child should be readmitted to school, perhaps with some changes in the educational program.

CHILDREN WHOSE PARENTS CANNOT BE LOCATED

If the school district is unable to identify or locate the parent or guardian of a child who may be handicapped, they must appoint someone to act as a "surrogate parent" for the child. The surrogate must be someone with the knowledge and skills to act on the child's behalf, and must not have any conflict of interest with the child; he or she may not be an employee of the school district.

Once appointed, the surrogate parent may take any action that a real parent may take regarding the child's education: he or she may consent or refuse to consent to certain actions by the school district, participate in the child's IEP conference, and request a review or hearing to challenge the recommendations of the district.

Conclusion

There has been a lot of discussion in this booklet about "rights." We explained what is meant by your child's right to a free appropriate public education, including an evaluation, an IEP, and an appropriate placement. Then we discussed your rights: to participate in the IEP conference, to be fully informed about your child's education, and to challenge your school district's decisions when you disagree with them. And we have made some suggestions to help you use these rights effectively. But the next step must be yours. While your school district must make every effort to meet your child's educational needs, your participation is an essential part of the whole process. The only way the rights discussed here can really make a difference is if you, as your child's advocate, take full advantage of every opportunity you have to share in the important decisions about your child's education. The rights and the opportunities are there; the rest is up to you.

Appendix

LEGAL BACKGROUND

The principal federal law concerned with the educational rights of the handicapped is Public Law 94-142, the Education for All Handicapped Children Act of 1975 (20 U.S.C. 1401 et seq.). This law, which went into effect on October 1, 1977, requires states receiving funds under the Act (of which New Jersey is one) to provide, by September 1, 1978, a free appropriate public education for all school-age handicapped children. The law specifies what states must do to meet this requirement, and guarantees the right of parents to participate fully in planning and monitoring the educational programs to be provided to their handicapped children.

Another federal law which affects the areas discussed in this booklet is Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 (29 U.S.C. 794). This law prohibits discrimination against handicapped persons in programs receiving federal funds; it applies to most if not all educational programs operated by local school districts in New Jersey. The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has issued regulations interpreting this law as it applies to education (45 C.F.R. Part 84); most of the requirements are similar to those in the regulations for Pub. L. 94-142 (45 C.F.R. Part 121a). The Section 504 regulations for education went into effect on June 3, 1977.

Many of the practices and procedures required by these federal laws were already included in New Jersey state law and regulations. The state special education regulations, however, were revised in August 1978 to bring New Jersey into full compliance with the federal laws. Copies of the state statutes (N.J.S.A. 18A:46-1 et seq.) and regulations (N.J.A.C. 6:28-1.1 et seq.) are available from local school districts and from the Bureau of Special Education and Pupil Personnel Services in Trenton.

In any case where New Jersey law and practice does not meet the minimum requirements of the federal laws, it is the federal laws which govern. If New Jersey law in some instances gives handicapped children and their parents more rights than required by federal law, you are entitled to the additional rights granted by the state.

HANDICAPPING CONDITIONS

Note: The following definitions are taken directly from the New Jersey special education regulations, N.J.A.C. 6:28-1.2.

Auditorily Handicapped

Definition:
An inability to hear within normal limits due to physical impairment or dysfunction of auditory mechanisms as distinguished by the following:

1. "Deaf" means loss of hearing, which is so severe that the pupil is impaired in processing linguistic information through hearing, with or without amplification, and educational information is adversely affected;
2. "Hard of hearing" means a loss of hearing, which may be permanent or fluctuating and adversely affects a pupil's educational performance, but which is not severe enough to warrant classification of a pupil as "deaf."

Additional evaluation required:
Specialist qualified in the field of audiology.

Chronically Ill

Definition:
A temporary or permanent health condition which makes it impractical to receive adequate instruction through a regular school program and is distinguished by the following:

1. "Chronic illness" means a chronic condition such as tuberculosis, lowered vitality, cardiac condition, leukemia, asthma, seizure disorders, or other physical disabilities which make it impracticable for the child to receive adequate instruction through the regular school program.
2. "Eligible for home instruction" means a temporary illness or injury which requires individualized instruction be provided to pupils confined to their homes or hospitals for a short period of time as determined by the school physician.

Additional evaluations required:
None.

Communication Handicapped

Definition:
Impaired native speech or language that is outside the range of acceptable variation and adversely affects a pupil's educational performance and/or interpersonal relationships and is not due primarily to hearing impairment as defined under "Auditorily handicapped," as distinguished by the following:

1. "Communication handicapped" means a communication disorder in native speech or language to a severe extent which seriously interferes with the ability to use oral language to communicate;
2. "Eligible for speech correction services" means a condition characterized by the presence of defective and incorrect sounds, including substitutions, omissions, additions and distortions of the speech sounds which require individualized instruction by a speech correctionist (and is not due primarily to hearing impairment as defined under "Auditorily handicapped"). This definition does not include pupils participating in language programs conducted by speech correctionists on a general basis.

Additional evaluation required:
Certified speech correctionist.

Emotionally Disturbed

Definition:
The exhibiting of behavioral disorders over an extended period of time which adversely affects educational performance and may be characterized by any of the following manifestations: an inability to learn which cannot be explained by intellectual, sensory or health factors; an inability to build or maintain satisfactory interpersonal relationships; inappropriate behaviors or feelings under normal circumstances; a general or pervasive mood of unhappiness or depression; and/or the development of physical symptoms or irrational fears relating to personal or school problems. This definition does not include social maladjustment as described in these regulations.

Additional evaluation required:
Psychiatrist trained or experienced in working with children.

Mentally Retarded

Definition:
Possessing an intellectual capacity below the average range of intelligence and having deficits in adaptive behavior which adversely affect educational performance and social functioning as distinguished by the following:

1. "Educable" means a level of retardation which is characterized by intellectual capacity, as measured by a clinical test of intelligence, within a range encompassing approximately one and one-half to three standard deviations below the mean and a low level of ability to think abstractly;
2. "Trainable" means a level of retardation which is characterized by intellectual capacity, as measured by a standardized clinical test of intelligence, which falls beyond three standard deviations below the mean; an inability to use symbols in the solution of problems of even low complexity; and an inability to function socially without direct and close supervision;
3. "Eligible for day training" means a level of retardation characterized by an inability to give evidence to a basic child study team of understanding and responding in a positive manner to simple directions expressed in the mode of primary communication and to express basic wants or needs due to mental retardation.

Additional evaluation required:
For children classified as Eligible for Day Training, a Curriculum Consultant from the Division of Mental Retardation, Department of Human Services.

Multiply Handicapped

Definition:
The presence of two or more educationally handicapping conditions which interact and result in problems so complex that placement in programs designed for a single handicapping condition will not result in significantly meaningful educational growth and achievement. All such educational handicaps shall be indicated for classification of the pupil. Eligibility for speech correction services, as defined in these regulations, shall not be indicated as one of the handicapping conditions which form the basis for a pupil being classified "Multiply handicapped."

Additional evaluations required:
Any evaluations required for the child's individual handicapping conditions.

Neurologically or Perceptually Impaired

Definition:
Impairment in the ability to process information due to physiological, organizational or integrational internal dysfunction which is not the result of any other handicapping condition as defined in these regulations. The condition is distinguished by the following:

1. "Neurologically impaired" means a severe and specific impairment, disorder or dysfunction of the central or peripheral nervous system which adversely affects the educational performance of a pupil and is not manifested as any other educationally handicapping conditions described in these regulations;
2. "Perceptually impaired" means the exhibiting of a specific learning disability due to a disorder in one or more of the basic psychological processes involved in understanding and learning and which affects the ability to listen, think, speak, read, write, spell and learn arithmetic to the extent that special education and related services are necessary for achievement and successful performance in an educational program. This definition does not include the manifestation of learning problems which are due primarily to any of the other educationally handicapping conditions described in these regulations or to environmental, cultural or economic disadvantage.

Additional evaluations required:
For neurological impairment, a physician qualified in the field of neurology. For perceptual impairment, specialists recommended by a basic child study team or a school physician when, in the judgment of the child study team or the school physician, an examination by such specialists would provide information necessary for diagnostic purposes or the development of an individualized education program.

Orthopedically Handicapped

Definition:
A condition which, because of malformation, malfunction or loss of bones, muscle, or body tissue, necessitates special education or related services, special equipment, or special facilities to permit functioning of normal learning processes, participation in regular school activities and maintenance of interpersonal relationships.

Additional evaluation required:
School physician or an orthopedic specialist approved by him or her.

Socially Maladjusted

Definition:
A pattern of social interaction which is characterized by conflicts which cannot be resolved adequately with the assistance of authority figures, or behavior that seriously interferes with the well-being or the property of others and is not due to emotional disturbance as defined in these regulations.

Additional evaluation required:
Psychiatrist trained or experienced in working with children.

Visually Handicapped

Definition:
An inability to use ocular mechanisms to see within normal limits as defined by the following:

1. "Blind" means a condition in which visual acuity, with correction, is 20/200 or poorer in the better eye and which necessitates a knowledge and skill in the use of special devices or techniques, such as Braille, for educational purposes;

2. "Partially sighted" means a condition in which visual acuity, with correction, is 20/70 or poorer in either eye, or, as a result of some other factors involved in visual functioning, inhibits the effective functioning in a learning environment without special education or related services.

Additional evaluation required:
A person legally qualified to determine visual disability, preferably a member of the Commission for the Blind and Visually Impaired.
